Scientific Advances To Mean Increased Apple Production

Orchardists who learn their scientific lessons well will likely find that their per tree production of apples will increase 20 to 30% in the next decade and a half, believe horticulturists at VPI.

Taking a long look ahead, the horticulturists have come up with the opinion that the milder spray programs now being adopted by the growers will contribute to the increased per-tree production, as will more effective mouse control methods, better fertilization practices, and wider use of chemical thinning sprays.

During the past 10 years the per-tree production of apples in Virginia has increased 42%. This increase has come about largely because of a gradual shift to milder spray programs, removing less productive orchards from production ,increased use of stop-drop sprays, and better pruning and fertilization practices, the horticulturists say.

At the time of the most recent apple and peach tree survey in 1956 enough apple trees were being set out to maintain present tree numbers. The current rate of planting is expected to continue, but not to increase more than slightly.

The varieties planted in Virginia orchards will not be changed drastically in the next 15 years, but some trends will likely occur. Red strains of Delicious will probably continue to make up a larger percentage of Virginia's crop. Golden Delicious also is expected to increase, while York will remain relatively constant, and may even drop some. Stayman will likely decline some, and Winesap will probably decline some for a few years and then increase. New varieties probably will not be used to any great extent. However, there will likely be a slight increase in the production of summer apples.

A trend toward the integration of the apple production and processing industries is expected to continue. Some of this integration will take place as the result of apple processors buying orchards, while some will take place as a result of fruit growers becoming more financially involved in the processing industry.

At the present time amout 50% of the apples produced in Virginia are processed. About the same proportion will continue to be processed in the years to come if growers are able to receive enough for their fruit to pay production costs and a modest profit. In recent years, prices to growers have been low. This has discouraged the production of processing apples, and has also led many growers in eastern states to plan for bargaining associations to handle the sale of processing apples. Some form of such organizations likely will begin operating in the near future, the horticulturists believe.

The demand for Virginia apples on the fresh market is expected to increase in the next 15 years. An expanded promotional program and improved quality should contribute to increased demand.

The total volume of peaches produced in Virginia is not expected to vary much in the next 15 years, but there will be some changes. The shift in production from central to eastern and northern Virginia will likely continue. The volume of Elberta peaches produced will continue to drop, but the drop is expected to be compensated for by an increase in varieties, maturing at different times.
